

The Blacks.—We have so frequently in the course of our short career called attention to the wild disorders and indecencies committed by the Blacks, and all, as it appears, to no useful purpose, that we may well be supposed to have become disgusted with the subject. We will, nevertheless, do our duty to the community, however unpleasant in some instances it may have become to us. In the beginning of the week the Blacks returned to Maitland from one of their usual short periods of absence, and immediately on their arrival they commenced their usual career of drunken gaiety and savage quarrelling, which they indulged in as heretofore, with impunity. The forbearance exercised towards these wretches only emboldens them to continue in their present disorderly course, and therefore we think it is quite time that they were brought under the operation of the Police Act.
